Postpandemic Human Migration: Impact on the US economy, agriculture and society

The COVID-19 pandemic has deeply affected all aspects of US society, including immigration, mobility and labor. Fewer migrants coming into the US has created a labor shortage, while at the same time we are seeing the prevalent role of migrants in “essential jobs.” An increase in remote work also plays a role.

Our panel of experts will discuss research on how immigration mobility has changed with COVID, including accelerated processes in the labor market, in the economy and in farm labor. They will also provide a unique description of how the situation at the US-Mexico border has evolved during the pandemic, from the perspective of migrants.
